The undersigned certify that they have read, and recommend to the Faculty of Graduate Studies for acceptance, a thesis entitled "THE WARDROBE ACCOUNT OF RICHARD OF BEVERLEY FOR THE FIFTY-FIRST YEAR OF THE REIGN OF KING EDWARD III OF ENGLAND" submitted by John A. Nielsen in partial fulfilment of the requirements for the degree of Master of Arts in History.

ABSTRACT

This thesis is a partial transcription and translation of the wardrobe account of Richard of Beverley, keeper of the wardrobe of the household of King Edward III of England. The document covers the period from November 25, 1376, when Beverley became keeper, until June 21, 1377, the day that Edward III died. In order to make arrangements for Edward's funeral and to settle his affairs, the household continued to function from June 21 until July 26, 1377. On that day it was dissolved. The thesis transcribes and translates all the tituli of receipts and expenses with the exception of the daily household expenses. As an example of the latter, a three week period, which covers Edward's funeral, has been included in the thesis. An appendix provides a total for each day of the daily household expenses.

The introduction contains a discussion of the household offices and their functions, the place of the household in the administration of the realm, a short resume of Richard of Beverley's career, and a brief history of Edward's last years. The introduction then comments upon each titulus of expenses or receipts. Finally, there is a discussion of Edward's death and funeral in order to establish the value of the comptus to the history of the king's last days.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENT

I wish to acknowledge my gratitude to Dr. F.D. Blackley for his many valuable suggestions and criticisms during the preparation of this thesis.

INTRODUCTION

The wardrobe account of Richard of Beverley for the fiftieth and fifty-first regnal years of Edward III of England (that is, from January 25, 1376 to June 21, 1377) is the subject of this thesis. This compotus, a manuscript in the Public Record Office,¹ consists of a parchment book of sixty-eight folios written in the abbreviated Latin court hand of the late fourteenth century. Most of the account is in the same hand, except for several additions and the marginal notations of the exchequer officials who checked and approved it (probatus).

Wardrobe accounts were "the formal and comprehensive statement of the whole wardrobe finances for a definite period of time, tendered in duplicate to the exchequer by the keeper and controller of the wardrobe."² They were originally drawn up in rolls, but around 1285 they took the form of leather-bound volumes. The exchequer audited the wardrobe accounts and then enrolled them for later reference. The wardrobe accounts and their enrollments began early in the 1200's. These enrollments "are not the accounts tendered by the wardrobe officials, but the accounts after they have been summarised, corrected and arranged by the exchequer clerks."³ Nevertheless, from the 1250's the wardrobe accounts began to be preserved exactly as they had been drawn up by the clerks. These were kept in the exchequer. Richard of Beverley's account appears to be of this latter type, that is, it was preserved as it was presented.

Under normal conditions the royal wardrobe accounts were only for one regnal year, or, if the period were less, for the term of the keepership. The account with which this thesis deals, however, was not compiled under normal conditions. When Edward III died on June 21, 1377, William of Mulso's account for the period of his keepership during Edward III's fiftieth regnal year (that is, from February 25 to November 24, 1376) had not been submitted to the exchequer for audit, and Richard of Beverley, his successor, eventually became responsible for drawing it up. In addition, it is also possible that Beverley's account for the remainder of the fiftieth regnal year (from November 25, 1376 until February 24, 1377) had not yet been submitted to the exchequer. Beverley eventually combined the two accounts for the fiftieth year with the account for Edward's incomplete fifty-first year.

The compotus does not cease with the death of Edward III. It continued until the household of that monarch was dissolved on July 16, 1377. This was the normal practice in the fourteenth century. There were many affairs to be settled, and, during the time of this comptus, arrangements had to be made for the funeral of the most distinguished of England's medieval rulers.

Richard of Beverley, the last of Edward III's wardrobe keepers, had had long household experience. He has been described as "one of a clan of Beverleys then holding offices about the court and in the Lancaster household" ⁴ As early as November 3, 1362, Richard of Beverley, chaplain, was mentioned in a land transaction, ⁵ and on May 2, 1363, when he witnessed another land transaction, he was called the Prior of Sempingham. ⁶ By 1367, Beverley had advanced into the king's service and was called king's clerk. He received two benefices in that year. On January 1, 1367 he was granted the prebend of Walton in the king's chapel of Briggenorth, ⁷ and later the same year (May 4) he was granted the deanery of the chapel of Wymbourne. ⁸ Beverley must have exhibited talent and initiative because he was cofferer of the household from April 13, 1369 until July 16, 1376. During this period Beverley received two more benefices. The prebend of Liddington in the church of Lincoln was granted to him on November 21, 1371,⁹ and on October 2, 1371, he was granted the prebend of Combe and Arnham in the Cathedral Church of Salisbury.¹⁰

William of Mulso, the keeper of Edward III's wardrobe since October 14, 1375, died in office on November 24, 1376, and Beverley succeeded to his office on the following day. Beverley continued at this post until July 26, 1377 in order to arrange the affairs of Edward's household, and, presumably, to serve the new king, Richard II. William of Pakington, who had been the receiver of the household of Richard II's mother, became officially the king's keeper of the wardrobe on July 1, 1377. Richard of Beverley does not seem to have continued to serve the royal household after July 26. It is possible that he became the keeper of John of Gaunt's wardrobe. A man of the same name assumed the office at this time and held the position until October 1, 1380.¹¹

On February 24, 1383, the prebend of Walton in Briggennorth, which had been held by Richard of Beverley, was granted to Thomas of Bromflet, king's clerk.¹² Beverley exchanged his position as dean of Wymbourne with John Carp, who was then treasurer of Lichfield, on July 23, 1387.¹³ Beverley held the position, which included the prebend of Sawley, until his death in October 1390.¹⁴ On September 27, 1390 Beverley exchanged his prebend of Liddington for the prebendary Centum Solidorum.¹⁵ He died before October 17, 1390.¹⁶

The second Richard of Beverley, however, was a knight and outlived the Richard of Beverley of this compotus.

Much of England's history and that of her kings remains hidden in manuscript wardrobe books. "Considering the importance of the wardrobe accounts, very little has been done towards their publication."¹⁷ The first complete account of an entire regnal year was the Liber Quotidianus Contrarotulatoris Garderobae anno regni Regis Edwardi primi vicesimo octave published by the Society of Antiquaries in 1787. Since that time few wardrobe accounts have been transcribed and none translated. Archaeologia contains scattered fragments as does Tout's Chapters. This wardrobe book has remained, until now, both untranscribed and untranslated.

Considerable work has been done on the functions of the royal household. The purpose of this thesis is to add to the detailed knowledge of Edward III's last years. In order to appreciate the importance of the wardrobe book, whose partial transcription and translation is contained in this thesis, it will be necessary first to outline the role and functions of the king's wardrobe.

The government of England during the middle ages was of a personal nature. "The King with his court was not merely the centre of the government; he was the whole government."¹⁸ Essential to personal government was the royal household and the use which the king made of his household officials in the administration of the realm. The household existed primarily to provide for the court's living. However, the administration was too complex to be handled by the king himself; he was forced to delegate authority to men whom he could trust. The king could seek these men only in the royal household. Furthermore, only men trained in the royal household were sufficiently capable of performing administrative tasks. The tendency of the king to draw upon men who owed their position to royal favour, who had been trained in the royal household, and who sympathized with the king's aims, furthered the use of household officers in the general administration. The king, nevertheless, did not differentiate between his public and his private functions. Household officials also administered the kingdom. Some retained this duality, while others left the household to staff new administrative departments. At an early date the exchequer, which was originally the household treasury, became detached and was established as a separate department. The chancery and the privy seal also became separate departments.

Since the government was essentially personal, it was carried on partly by agents and offices which existed only in the household, and partly by others which existed outside. This duality is reflected to some extent in the compotus with which this thesis deals.

The royal household had two functions: the first was domestic. It was responsible for feeding and lodging the king and his court. The second was the role the household played in the general administration of the country. Departments such as the kitchen, pantry, and buttery were concerned only with the domestic aspects. The wardrobe, however, because of its intimate relation with the king, could be used by him in the general administration of the realm.

The feeding of the household and the court was the responsibility of two offices.¹⁹ The kitchen, with its

¹⁹J. H. Johnson, "The King's Wardrobe and Household," The English Government at Work, 1327-1336, Volume I, Central and Prerogative Administration, ed., James F. Willard and subordinate departments of the larder, poultry, scullery, and saucery, formed one office, and the pantry and buttery constituted the other. The clerk of the kitchen supervised the purchasing of meat and fish which were stored in the larder. The meat and fish were prepared in the kitchen. The office of the poultry was concerned with the purveying²⁰ of poultry and its delivery to the kitchen. The duty of the scullery was to obtain wood and coal, while the saucery bought or purveyed the materials necessary for the making of sauces. The heads of these subordinate departments submitted an account to the clerk of the kitchen.

The buttery and the pantry were under one official who was responsible for the quality and quantity of the bread, wine, and ale used in the household. Wine and ale were purchased by the buttery. The pantry concerned itself with buying or purveying bread; various grades of bread were also prepared in the bakery. Items such as wax, napery, linen, cloth, and spices were stored in the spicery. The spicery received these materials from the great wardrobe, which was no longer a part of the household, and issued them to the other household departments. The napery received the napery from the spicery. Ewerers and laundresses also formed part of the napery. The chandlery was part of the spicery.

William A. Morris (Cambridge, Mass., The Mediaeval Academy of America, 1940), pp. 207-237, contains a detailed discussion of these domestic offices.

²⁰This refers to the right of the king to buy, at an advantageous rate, items necessary in the household. Often purveyors did not pay but gave a tally in return for the goods taken. These tallies showed the amount owed, what and how much was taken, and from whom it was purveyed. Foils of tallies were kept by the purveyors and handed to the head of the department along with the articles. Tallies could be redeemed in the wardrobe.

Lodging of the household and the king was the duty of the hall. A part of the hall was the chamber. The king and his immediate followers lodged and dined in the chamber, while the majority of household members dined in the hall. Allowances were made for those unable to eat in the household. The principal officers of this department were the two marshals of the hall. One marshal acted as harbinger;²¹ the other maintained order and regulated seating in the hall. When there was no lodging to be arranged, they alternated at the meals. The provision of lodging for household members and their horses formed the duties of one of the marshals, but the king's own horses were the province of another office, the marshalsea. In addition, this department kept a record of attendance of household members and it paid wages. The head of the marshalsea was also responsible for keeping the accounts of hay, oats, harnesses, and all materials necessary to horses and carts. Purveyance for the marshalsea was carried out by the avenery. This document, however, makes only one mention of a marshalsea; for the most part it refers to the stable (stabulum). It is impossible to know whether the term stabulum includes the costs of stabling the horses of household members and the king, or merely one of these.

Whether a clerk or a layman, the heads of these departments had essentially the same duties. He was responsible for, and was required to keep a record of, all the materials which pertained to his office, as well as those which were received and issued by his office. In many instances, other members of the household were to be present when these articles were received, weighed, divided, or issued, to ensure that the quality and quantity of the items issued and received were sufficient. The account which was compiled by the head of the department had to be balanced every night and to be presented at an audit before the dual heads of the household, the steward and the treasurer. It was from these daily accounts that the accounts of household expenses were made up.

The most important household office was the wardrobe. It was primarily the accounting and secretarial office of the household and gave a unity to the whole organization. The head of the household's financial concerns was the treasurer of the household, or, as he was also called, the keeper of the wardrobe. He, along with the steward, was responsible for seeing that the various departments submitted their accounts of money and materials received and issued. In addition, the keeper was responsible for the receipt and expenditure of money in the household, and for drawing up periodic accounts. These accounts were submitted for audit to the exchequer, either yearly or when the keeper left his office. A duplicate copy of the keeper's accounts was kept by the controller of the household. This procedure was used not merely as a check on the keeper but it was also used to verify that the controller had approved the stated expenditure.

Both the keeper and the controller were important as officers of state and as household officials. They were often engaged in affairs of state and were forced to delegate their domestic duties to others. The keeper's responsibilities were delegated to the cofferer of the household. The cofferer, once the cashier of the household, now supervised the accounts of the wardrobe and on occasion appeared for the keeper at the exchequer audit. The controller could also delegate his duties to someone else, though his title is not known and he seems to have been from outside the household.²²

In general the wardrobe included all those parts of the central administration which had not yet become separated from the household. The wardrobe was capable of becoming the great spending department of the central government; it had demonstrated this during most of Edward II's reign, and after the first decade of Edward III's reign. From the time of Edward III's attempts to conquer Scotland during the 1300's

²²J. H. Johnson, "The King's Wardrobe and Household," pp. 229-230.

"the wardrobe in war-time became the main instrument of the temporary war administration."²³ Expansion of the wardrobe, however, required conditions which were not present in the later years of Edward's reign.

During his last years, Edward III took little interest in the government of the kingdom. "He gradually lost his grip on the administration, and even the ceremonial aspects of a king's life, in which he had formerly taken immense delight, had now become irksome to him."²⁴ His invalid son Edward, the Black Prince, cared little for affairs of state. Edward III's next son, John of Gaunt, thus became the representative of the monarchy. Gaunt, however, was involved with the war in France; he served as both a general and diplomat until 1376. The administration of England, then, was not closely controlled. Because of these circumstances some officials took advantage of their position and powers.

It was under such conditions that a parliament met on April 28, 1376, "to provide for the good government of the realm, the safety of the King's dominions and the prosecution of the war"²⁵ A subsidy was necessary but the commons refused to vote for one until there had been a redress of grievances. The commons then attacked and impeached certain officials, one of whom was William Latimer, the king's chamberlain. In addition, Alice Perrers, the king's mistress, was banished from the court. Parliament next appointed a standing committee of lords to oversee the work of the ministers, with the exception of the chancellor, treasurer, and privy seal. During this parliament the heir to the throne, Edward, the Black Prince, died (June 8). The commons then demanded that Richard of Bordeaux, the Black Prince's son, be introduced in parliament as Edward III's heir. Furthermore, all the lands and titles of his father were bestowed upon Richard at parliament's insistence. These actions of parliament roused Gaunt to anger. The ministers who were attacked were ministers of the crown of which Gaunt was the representative. Even more insulting was the action of having Richard introduced to parliament. It suggested that Gaunt had designs upon the throne.

John of Gaunt was quick to retaliate. No sooner had parliament risen (July 6, 1376) than Gaunt "declared the "Good" Parliament to be no Parliament at all, and condemned its acts as null and void. He dismissed the council which the Commons had tried to place about the King, restored those who had been impeached, and allowed the King's mistress to return to the court."²⁶ Gaunt then proceeded to attack the leaders of the Good Parliament. Peter de la Mare, the speaker of the commons, was imprisoned, and William of Wykeham, the bishop of Winchester, who had attacked Latimer, was banished from the court. Gaunt next attacked the church and priests who were devoted to secular rather than religious services; he encouraged John Wycliffe to speak against the church. Since the war with France required more money, a new parliament met on January 27, 1377. Gaunt insured that this parliament would give him no trouble by filling it with his supporters. Parliament acquiesced and readily voted a 4d. poll tax. Gaunt did receive opposition from the bishops; they refused to do any business unless Wykeham was allowed to be present in the convocation. Gaunt permitted him to return. The bishop of London, William Courtenay, attacked Gaunt through the person of Wycliffe. Courtenay ordered Wycliffe to appear before the bishops to answer for his sermons.

The first day of Wycliffe's trial ended in tumult. Rough methods were used to get Wycliffe through the crowd and into the church. Gaunt and Courtenay disputed the point of seating Wycliffe. Finally, when Gaunt threatened to drag Courtenay by his hair from the church, the meeting was adjourned. Gaunt had insulted the bishop of London. The Londoners, ever suspecting Gaunt, believed that he meant to take away their liberties. Mobs attacked Gaunt's residence, although Gaunt was absent and escaped from the city. On February 23, 1377, parliament dissolved. Peace was restored through the mediation of prince Richard's mother. "Power had slipped from [John of Gaunt, the duke of] Lancaster, and the worshippers of the rising sun were already seeking the favour of the prince and his mother rather than that of the duke."²⁷ Thus ended Edward III's reign. Very little of this tumult is reflected in the compotus which is the consideration of this thesis.

In the 1370's the wardrobe organization was, in general, concerned only with domestic affairs. The direction of the war in France was no longer the task of the wardrobe. As soon as the wardrobe became entirely domestic, expenses decreased. Another reason for lowered spending was the change in the way that Edward lived. During his early years as king he wandered constantly, and his household accompanied him. In his later years Edward became almost a recluse, and, because of his illnesses, travelled little. His movements were restricted principally to his favourite manors and castles in south-eastern England, such as Sheen, Windsor, and Haverling-atte-Bower. Often Edward withdrew from his official household and was therefore "out of court" (extra curiam). He was then attended only by his privata familia. The present account exemplifies this state of affairs. Although the household remained at Windsor during the entire period of account until after Edward's death, Edward's alms (elemosina) and gifts (dona) indicate that Edward was elsewhere.

The hospicium expenses show that the household spent most of its time stationed at Windsor. It was at Windsor from November 25, 1376, the beginning of the account, until June 27, 1377. Not until a week after Edward III's death at ²⁷Tout, Chapters, III, 320.

Sheen did the household arrive there (June 28). It remained at Sheen until July 2. It then presumably accompanied Edward's body from Sheen to Westminster, staying the night of July 3 at St. Paul's in London, and reaching Westminster on the fourth. The household resided there until July 8. For the rest of the account, from July 9 to July 26, the household was stationed at Bernelines.²⁸

Although the household was inactive, Edward himself moved about; because of his illnesses, these movements were necessarily limited. Oblations at masses show that Edward spent Christmas, the Feast of St. John the Evangelist (December 27), and the Epiphany (January 6) at Havering. He celebrated the mass for the Purification of the Blessed Mary at Havering (February 2). On the eleventh of February Edward moved from Havering to Sheen.²⁹ It was at Sheen that Edward spent Good Friday and Easter (March 29). The elemosina show that Edward observed St. George's Day (April 23) in Windsor, as well as attending a Requiem Mass on the following day. An item in the dona states that Petroville Pope received 6s.8d., at Windsor, for carrying the familia regis across the Thames at Datchet on April 25. Possibly this was for Edward's return from Windsor to Sheen. At any event, he spent Pentecost (May 17) at Sheen. In addition, ²⁸No trace of Bernelines has been discovered in the contemporary records available to me. Perhaps it was a royal manor near London.

²⁹Tout, Chapters, III, 318 and n. 1.

on June 8, Edward celebrated an anniversary mass for his son Edward, the Black Prince, at Sheen.

Several items in the prests (prestita) indicate that Edward took a sea voyage (viagia supra mare). 14,000 billets of firewood and 360 quarters of charcoal were used for the replenishing (reparacione) of Portchester Castle. A further 20 quarters of charcoal were stored at Shotle near Orwell. No date, unfortunately, is given with these items to suggest when Edward went on this expedition. Since accounts, however, were years in arrears, it is possible that the items refer to Edward's last attempted expedition in 1372 when he tried to relieve La Rochelle. He was at sea from August 31 to October 14, but contrary winds forced him to return to Winchelsea. The charcoal was probably meant for use in cannon.

Because the management of England was left to others while Edward lived the life of a recluse, there was little opportunity for the wardrobe to engage in the administration of the country. When officers of the household were occupied with official business, they found it necessary to leave the court. In the present account some of the high-ranking officers were absent from court for long periods. The account covers 210 days, of which the steward, John of Ypres, was absent for 180. Similarly, Richard of Beverley, the keeper of the wardrobe or the treasurer of the household (as he is once called in the account), was away for 75 days.

William Street, the controller, was absent for 95 days. Because of his domestic duties, the cofferer, John Carp, was absent only 22 days. The account, therefore, is largely concerned with domestic expenses, but it does indicate by the absences of the major household officers that they were still used in the general administration.³⁰

The wardrobe had to account for its receipts and expenses to the exchequer. Income received by the wardrobe was divided into two categories: receipts of the exchequer (recepta scaccarii) and foreign receipts (recepta forinseca). The foreign receipts were receipts paid directly into the wardrobe and not received from the exchequer. This type of receipt included the value of goods left in the household by the previous keeper, sale of deteriorated stock, the wines received from the king's butler, and items received from the great wardrobe. Profits from the pleas of the hall and market were also listed as a foreign receipt. Most of the foreign receipts were actually book-keeping entries.

The receipts from the exchequer were not always paid directly to the wardrobe. Rather, it was the custom of the exchequer to pay wardrobe creditors, crediting the wardrobe with the amount. The wardrobe also drew money from local officials who accounted for it at the exchequer. When these officials had proved their payment, the amount was entered on the issue roll of the exchequer as a payment to the wardrobe. Any amount listed on the exchequer issue roll as being issued to the wardrobe was considered a receipt from the exchequer, even though the money may not have been received directly by the wardrobe.

In the account the recepta scaccarii amounts to almost £7,900, whereas the recepta forinseca totals nearly £3,645. Of the sum for the foreign receipts, almost £1,800 was derived from the foods left in the household at the death of William of Mulso, the previous keeper. A further £1,447 was received from Philip la Vache, the receiver of Edward's chamber, against the funeral expenses of the king. The other £400 was derived from: (1) the increase of measure (de incremento mesure), (2) the yield of the pleas of the hall and the market (de exitibus placitorum et mercati), and (3) the value of the king's prise wines collected by the king's butler. It was customary for the purveyor of grain, in this case Richard Fode, to receive 21 quarters of grain as 20. The extra quarter was the incrementum which was regarded as a receipt.³¹ The clerk of the market, Helming Leget, had two duties.³² He was the steward's controller for pleas of the hall. The steward had jurisdiction of offenses committed within the verge of the court.³³ This jurisdiction included members of the household. As clerk of the market, it was his duty to see that the assizes of bread, wine, and ale, and of weights and measures, were obeyed within the verge. He tried those breaking the assizes. The clerk of the market accounted to the keeper of the wardrobe for fines and forfeited goods. The king's butler, Geoffrey Newton, who was independent of the wardrobe, collected prise wines³⁴ and delivered them to the household.

Another source of income is listed separately in a section which deals with debentures issued to various household creditors. Wardrobe debentures³⁵ were strips of parchment used to record the creditor's name, the amount, and the nature of the debt. For authentication they were sealed by a wardrobe clerk. They could be redeemed for cash in the exchequer, but because they were negotiable, they could be assigned by the owner to others for cash. The creditors were paid by the exchequer, and the sums were regarded as a receipt by the wardrobe. They can, therefore, be regarded as

The household thus ended the period of the account with a net deficit of £2.17s.

The first tituli of expenses listed in the compotus, although given no formal title in this document, is that of the household (hospicium) expenses. The daily hospicium expenses are arranged under eleven headings in the following order: pantry, buttery, wardrobe, kitchen, poultry, scullery, saucery, hall and chamber, stable, wages, and alms. The daily expenses are totalled in the right-hand margin of the page. Each week's reckoning occupies a single page in the account, and is totalled and approved at the bottom of the page. At the end of each month of the account (which is reckoned for four weeks), the sum of that period is totalled and approved at the bottom of the page.

An appendix to this thesis contains the sum of the daily expenses, as well as the weekly totals which appear in the manuscript. As an example of daily expenses, a three-week period has been selected. It commences on June 21, 1377, the day that Edward III died, and ends on July 11. Not only does this period exemplify the hospicium expenses, but it adds information about Edward's death and funeral by detailing how much was spent by the household on the funeral rites. This period of three weeks marks the only time in the whole of the account that the household did not reside in one place. The daily household expenses for this interval fall into two groups, those prior to Edward's funeral and those after. Following the king's burial, the expenses declined to one-third of the normal amount spent while he was alive.

Of the eleven headings mentioned above, the two most important were the buttery and the kitchen. Combined, the daily expenses accounted for approximately one-third to slightly over one-half of the total daily expenditure of the whole household. The buttery expenditures ranged from £6 to £10. On a feast day, such as Christmas, it spent almost £20, and on the day of Edward's funeral £132 were spent. The kitchen generally spent more than the buttery; its daily expenses normally ranged from £6 to £11. At Christmas, however, the kitchen spent £31; it spent £100 for Edward's funeral. After Edward's burial, when the total daily household expenses were in the range of £9 to £15, these two departments were still important, since the buttery spent between 25s. and 45s. and the kitchen between 45s. and 90s.

The poultry normally spent between 50s. and 90s. each day, with the exception of Friday and Saturday which were fish days; then the expenses were, at the most, 20s. On special days or feast days the poultry's spending rose appreciably. It spent £20 on Christmas Day and £129 for Edward's burial. For the period which followed the funeral the average daily expenditure was 20s., with the exception of Friday and Saturday when less than 5s. were used.

Among the offices concerned with food, the pantry, scullery, and saucery spent relatively little. Combined, they spent less than 50s. per day prior to Edward's funeral and less than 20s. after. This was not the case on special days, but even then their spending was a mere fraction of the daily expenditure.

In contrast to those departments whose spending varied with the importance of the day, there were departments which remained more constant. Nevertheless, their expenditures also varied according to the number of persons in the household. At the outset of the account the stable spent 70s. to 90s. daily, exceeding this only on special days. Between December 31, 1376, and February 14, 1377, however, the stable used between 105s. and 130s. After February 15 stable expenditures again fell to their former limits, except for June 3, 4, 5, and 6, when they rose as high as £9. Expenditures were higher on special days. £9 was spent at Edward's funeral. After the funeral normal expenditure was between £3 and 90s.

The wages (vadia), although varying from day to day, averaged £2 to £3. After the funeral they ranged from 20s. to 30s. This decrease in wages paid reflects the diminished size of the household, which was occupied in arranging Edward's affairs.

The hall and chamber's average expenditure was 20s. per day. At Edward's funeral it spent over £12. This sum was but a small fraction of the daily total spending of the household.

The wardrobe proper was the most erratic of the departments in its spending. Acting as the secretarial department of the household, the wardrobe purchased parchment, ink, pens, and other items; it supplied all the materials necessary for the accounts to be drawn up and the records to be kept by the wardrobe clerks. Carriage for these items, as well as the valuables and documents stored in the wardrobe, must also be included in the expenses. The sums expended generally ranged from 30s. to 100s., with amounts between 50s. and 90s. being the most common. However, the wardrobe's expenditure rose considerably on some days even though the day was not important in itself. Thus, from December 5 to December 18, 1376, wardrobe expenses ranged from £6 to £9, at times amounting to one-fourth of the daily total. On other occasions the expenditure dropped as low as 7s. (February 11, 1377). On important days the wardrobe spent much more than 100s. The wardrobe used £37 on Christmas Day and £115 for Edward's funeral. After the funeral between 5s. and 15s. was the normal amount expended.

The alms is the second titulus of expenses listed in the account. It contains payments to paupers, offerings at masses and shrines, oblations to participants at masses, and alms given to certain religious houses. The sums mentioned in this titulus as expended on alms are in addition to the daily 4s. which are noted in the hospicium expenses. The alms are of great interest because nearly half of the items are connected in one way or another with Edward's funeral.

The next titulus of expenses is the necessaries (necessaria). Under this heading are those items which are not included under other headings. These include the wages of household members who receive wages for the rest of their lives, as well as the wages of household officers absent from the court (extra curiam) on the king's business. An example of the latter is the wages paid to the king's physician, Master John Glaston, who was absent for a week preparing medicine for the king. Almost £8 was spent on medicines. Also included in this titulus are losses incurred by the king's butler, Geoffrey Newton. Newton had to fill casks which had leaked; he also sold at a loss wines which had gone sour. These losses were listed as expenses. The cost of shipping the wines are also included. Grains sold at a loss by Richard Fode, the baker, were listed as an expense. Payments to the clerks who wrote the book of account and the counter-roll were also listed. The final item has been added by a second hand. It records a payment to Richard of Beverley and other clerks who helped to draw up the accounts of Beverley and William of Mulso; it also mentions the expenses incurred by Beverley for Edward's funeral. The payment covered 218 days, although the period required to draw up the accounts covered almost two years (from July 27, 1377 to July 9, 1379). The task of drawing up the accounts cost over £133.

The next two titles, the purchase of horses (empcio equorum) and the replacement of horses (restaurum equorum), need little comment. It is sufficient to note that the king reimbursed those household members whose horses died in the king's service.

Fees and robes (feoda et robe) is the next titulus. Most of its items deal with allowances for seasonal robes and footwear. Knights received fees while household members of lower rank received wages. The wages are not itemized, but are grouped under the vadia in the hospicium expenses. Not all the household members received wages from the king. Clerks were not normally allotted wages; they were expected to live on the revenue of their benefices. In addition, some household members probably were paid by the head of their department, and thus would not appear under this titulus. All members, however, did receive allowances for robes unless they were absent from the court.³⁶ Important officers, like John of Ypres, the steward, received £6.13s.4d. for his fees for the Easter season and £10.13s.4d. for his winter and summer robes. Richard of Beverley is only listed for his robe allowances, probably because he was a clerk. Knights of the chamber received 66s.8d. as a fee. For winter and summer robes they received 106s.8d. This type of robe allowance was the same as given to men such as William Street, the controller, and John Carp, the cofferer, but they, as well as lower ranking household members, do not receive fees. Sergeants, sergeants-at-arms, and some clerks received 46s.8d. for robes, whereas other clerks, esquires, and falconers were given 13s.4d. Yeomen and those who received less for their robe allowances were also given a shoe allowance, which the higher remunerated members were not.

³⁶ Charles Johnson, "The System of Account in the Wardrobe of Edward I," Transactions of the Royal Historical Society, 4th ser., VI, 68.

This shoe allowance amounted to 4s.8d. for winter and summer.

Following the feoda et robe is a titulus called gifts (dona). Most of those receiving gifts are household members; a gift to them might be a reward for a service well done. For example, Geoffrey Chaucer is listed as receiving one gallon of Gascon wine daily for the rest of his life. Others also received gifts from the king. Edward's son Thomas of Woodstock, the earl of Buckingham, received a gift of wine, as did Edward's mistress, Alice Perrers. Another man who received a gift from the king was Petroville Pope. He was granted 6s.8d. for transporting the familia regis across the Thames at Datchet. This entry is not mentioned elsewhere in the account. Perhaps the money paid to Pope was his wages, although, if that were the case, it would have been listed in the necessaria. The belief that the entry refers to Pope's wages is supported by the fact that only Pope received a gift of money. The rest of the items in the dona are gifts of wine.

Messengers (nuncii) is a very short list, since it contains only two items. The second item is dated June 21, the day that Edward died.

The next two tituli deal with the pastime of hunting which was enjoyed by Edward in his younger days. Because of his age and illness, it is probable that he gave it up sometime before he died. Hunters' wages and dogs' food allowance (vadia venatorum et putura canium) and falconers' wages and falcons' food allowance (vadia falconariorum et putura falconum) are the titles of these two expenses. The wages paid the hunters covered the period during which they were absent from the court. They received 1 1/2d. daily. Dogs absent with the hunters were also given daily allowances. Most of the hunting dogs, which were all greyhounds, were given a food allowance of 3/4d. per day. Unlike the vadia venatorum, which records only payments to members who were absent from court, the vadia falconariorum records allowances and wages paid to members of the department both in and out of court. The king's falconers were paid 12s. per day both within the court as well as without. Others received 3s. a day in court and 6s. out of court. Even lower scales of wages appear. These lower wages must have been to porters, who are named as receiving 2d. per day. Falcons were given a food allowance of 1d. a day when out of court. Several goshawks are noted as receiving a food allowance of 1 1/2d. per day when absent from court. Some dogs are also recorded as being with the falconers when out of court and they were given a daily food allowance of 1/2d. One of the king's horses had a daily food allowance of 3d.

The last titulus in the expenses is the prests (prestita). "Any payment for which the recipient was expected to account with the wardrobe was regarded as a prest."³⁷

³⁷E. B. Fryde, ed., Book of Prests of the King's Wardrobe for 1294-5, Presented to John Goronwy Edwards (Oxford, Clarendon Press, 1962), p. xviii.

Payments of money which had to be repaid and advances which would become due to the recipient at some point, such as wages, and which were required to perform some task, were regarded as prests, or imprests as they are sometimes called.³⁸ Some of these items have already been noted. The items referring to Edward's sea expedition are found in the prestita. Many of the prests are items concerned with the king's butler, Geoffrey Newton. Much of the wine issued to individuals, and which was not consumed by the household, was charged as a prest against Newton. These items, occupying half of the titulus, are merely cross-references to expenses noted elsewhere in the compotus.

This compotus is of great interest because some of the items pertain to Edward's funeral, an event which contemporary chroniclers have neglected.³⁹ Their only comment is "corpus ejus apud Westmonasterium honorifice est humatum."⁴⁰ This absence of information possibly indicates that the chroniclers were too interested in the forthcoming coronation of Richard II which occurred on July 16, only eleven days after Edward's burial.

Edward III died on Sunday, June 21, in his manor-house at Sheen.⁴¹ His death is noted in the hospicium expenses of that day by the marginal note: "quo die Rex Edwardus tercius obiit." On the same day two messengers, Simon of Burgh and William Blacomore, were sent from Sheen to Dover. The fact that the two men went to Dover would seem to suggest that they intended to cross the channel, possibly to travel to the court of Charles V, the king of France, to inform him of Edward's death. Charles celebrated a Requiem Mass in Paris for Edward when he heard the news.

Edward's household, stationed at Windsor, did not arrive at Sheen until June 28, a week after Edward's death. Other individuals arrived before the household, because on June 23 Richard II offered 6s.8d. in oblations at a mass which was celebrated for Edward's soul in the chapel in Sheen. Edward's son Edmund of Langley, the earl of Cambridge, offered 3s.4d. at the same mass.

Roger Chandler of London must have arrived at Sheen soon after Edward's death. The elemosina show that he received £21 for his labours and various expenses for the preservation of Edward's body from putrefaction with balsam and other unguents and oils. Although the account gives no details, Edward's body may have been disembowled as a guard against putrefaction, and then embalmed.

Stephen Hadley was another person who hurried to ⁴¹The modern Richmond.

Sheen. He fashioned "an image in the likeness of the king," as well as a sceptre and an orb. For these and other expenses which he incurred during the preparation of the king's body prior to the funeral, Hadley received £22.4s.11d. The "other expenses" probably included the coffin upon which the funeral effigy was borne. The effigy⁴² or "image" consisted of a wooden torso with a plaster head based on wood. The torso was hollowed out at the back. Recent restoration of the effigy shows that the plaster head was a death-mask, indicating paralysis on the left side of the face; the paralysis had resulted from a stroke.⁴³ The account gives no details of the clothing either of Edward's body or his effigy.

The discovery that Edward suffered a stroke is consistent with the medical description of the death scene in the Chronicon Angliae. On his death-bed Edward refused to believe that he was dying and preferred to talk about hunting rather than repenting his sins:⁴⁴

⁴²St. John Hope, plate LVII, shows the whole effigy. R. P. Howgrave-Graham, "The Earlier Royal Funeral Effigies -- New Light on Portraiture in Westminster Abbey," Archaeologia, XCVIII (1961), plate XLVII, shows the face at various stages of restoration. Maurice Collis, The Hurling Time (London, Faber and Faber, 1958), plates 11 and 12, shows the face and the tomb effigy made from the funeral effigy.

⁴³Howgrave-Graham, p. 161.

⁴⁴Edward's interest in the chase is reflected in the inordinate length of the two sections of expenses dealing with the wages for hunters and falconers and the food allowances for dogs and falcons.

Igitur, ut praelibavimus, repente praeoccupatus die mortis suae, contra opinionem propriam et sibi obsequentium, subito praeclusa voce, coepit manifesta monstrare mortis indicia, per quae sibi astantes, et ipsemet cognovit se proculdubio moriturum.⁴⁵

Edward's loss of voice must have been the result of his stroke.

When Alice Perrers heard of Edward's imminent death, she meditated flight:

sed ante recessum suum, ut cunctis manifeste monstraret se regem, non propter se, sed propter sua dilexisse, anulos, quos pro dignitate regia gestabat in digitis, de regiis manibus furtive subtraxit⁴⁶

Not only was Edward deserted by Alice Perrers but all his servants also fled. Only one priest attended him, urging Edward to repent his sins:

Rex autem sacerdotis monitis mox acquiescens, quamquam parvo ante vocis organo caruisset, tamen resumptis viribus, omni nisu nitebatur loqui quod habebat in mente; et, tam pro debilitate corporis, quam contritione cordis, interrupta a singultu oratione, et verbis vix semiplene prolatis, "Jesu," ait, "miserere!" Et hoc postremo verbo conclusit omnia verba sua.⁴⁷

Then Edward, extendens manum a parte, took a cross that the priest held out to him:

Qui illico suscepit crucem in manibus, et cum lacrimis atque gemitu admovit ori suo, devotissime illam deosculans et adorans. Et post modici temporis intervallum reddidit spiritum suum Deo.⁴⁸

⁴⁶Ibid., p. 143.

⁴⁷Ibid., p. 144.

⁴⁸Ibid., p. 146.

Unfortunately the household book gives no detailed information about the manner of Edward's death. The household as a body was not with the king at Sheen when he died. Edward was with his privata familia which may, or may not, have included Alice Perrers. Nevertheless, it seems unlikely that the king's favorite companions, with the exception of a priest, would desert him on his death-bed.

The sudden influx of people into Sheen is reflected in the sharp increase in the hospicium expenses on the day of Edward's death and on the two days following. Although Edward did not reside in the official household, that organization was still responsible for the expenses incurred by the king and his privata familia. The expenses on June 21 rose to £32 from the £24 of the previous day. On the next two days the expenses were £46 and £35, after which they dropped to £27, their former level.

On June 28 Philip la Vache, the receiver of Edward's chamber, gave the wardrobe £1,447 toward the burial expenses. On the same day Robert Whitbergh, Edward's almoner, gave 100s. to paupers attending a Requiem Mass celebrated in St. Paul's in London, in the presence of the archbishop of Canterbury and other dignitaries. This mass must have been celebrated without the presence of Edward's body: it seems reasonable to suppose that the body travelled from Sheen with the household, which did not reach London until July 3.

The hospicium expenses indicate that on July 2 the household was at Sheen. On the third the household was at St. Paul's and at Westminster on the fourth. The elemosina show that a Requiem Mass was celebrated for Edward on the fourth at St. Paul's. Another was celebrated in Westminster on July 5, the day of Edward's burial. The evidence would indicate that Edward's body left Sheen on July 3 and reached London later the same day, spending the night there. Possibly the body was transported by water from Sheen to London. On February 11, while ill, Edward had travelled by water from Havering to Sheen.⁴⁹ In whatever manner the body was moved, it is not necessary to conclude, as does St. John Hope,⁵⁰ that the trip was made at night. The candles used during the trip could certainly have been carried during the daytime, since they were not used as a means of lighting but were part of a religious rite.⁵¹ On July 4 Edward's body was moved from London to Westminster. On the following day he was buried.

The conclusion that Edward's body did not leave Sheen until the third is further strengthened by two entries in the elemosina. Robert Whitbergh distributed money to paupers inter Shene et Westmonasterium per tres dies. Whitbergh, therefore, distributed money on the trips from Sheen to London, from London to Westminster, and on the day that ⁴⁹Tout, Chapters, III, 318 and n. 1.

⁵¹Howgrave-Graham, p. 162.

Edward was buried. Furthermore, the paupers wore black tunics. Since the cloth was not purchased until June 28 and July 1, and time had to be allowed for the making of the tunics, Edward's body could not have been moved until July 3.

The recepta scaccarii shows that £333.6s.8d. was received on July 1st from Richard II's exchequer against the expenses of the dead king's household. On the same day a total of £470 was received by Whitbergh from the exchequer. Whitbergh distributed this money to paupers while Edward's body was in transit from Sheen to Westminster. An additional sum of £27.15s.4d. was given to paupers who wore black tunics and carried lighted torches around the king's body during this trip. The cloth for the tunics was purchased by John of Sleaford at a cost of £300. 7,511 pounds of wax, in the form of 1,700 torches, 15 large candles, and 12 mortuary candles, were used at a cost of £227.15s.11 1/2d. Although the document says that these were used inter Shene et Westmonasterium, it seems reasonable to suppose that these "lights," especially the large candles and the mortuary candles, were not used while the body was in transit. One would suppose that the large candles and the mortuary candles were placed on Edward's hearse⁵² as he lay in state at St. Paul's.

⁵²" . . . a framework with a sloping roof having candlesticks or prickets at the corners and along the sides, placed over the coffin during the burial service or watch." J. S. Purvis, Dictionary of Ecclesiastical Terms (Edinburgh, Thomas Nelson and Sons Ltd., 1962), p. 91.

On July 4 Edward's body was in London since John Pope and William Campion, chandlers of London, received £21 for a hearse, as well as for the carriage of that hearse, which was erected over Edward's body in the cathedral church of St. Paul's. The two men were paid the £21 ex certa convencione secum factum which presumably means "out of a certain agreement made with them." The sum seems to include their wages as well as the materials used for the hearse and its conveyance to the church.

At the Requiem Mass which was celebrated in St. Paul's on July 4, the duke of Lancaster, John of Gaunt, offered 6s.8d. in oblations, while the earl and countess of Cambridge each offered half that amount, 3s.4d. After the mass the king's body was transported to Westminster. On the following day, July 5, the day of Edward's burial, a Requiem Mass was celebrated for Edward in the Convent Church of Blessed Peter in Westminster.

William Hanly received £59.16s.8d. for money paid by him for the making of a hearse which was erected at Westminster. This was, from the price, obviously a finer hearse than the one erected in London. Oblations to participants at the funeral mass in Westminster cost 2s.1d. In addition, the sacristan of the church received 20s. for his labours in ringing the bells.

At the Requiem Mass celebrated on July 21, 1377, the dies mensis,⁵³ 1,862 pounds of wax at a cost of £56.8s.10d. was used for 300 large candles placed around Edward's tomb. The amount of wax and the number of candles would seem to indicate that these candles were not only lighted on July 21st, but were lighted from his funeral until the dies mensis. Oblations to participants at the mann cost 2s.4d. and £25 was distributed to paupers by Robert Whitbergh. The recepta scaccarii shows that he had received this money from the exchequer a week earlier.

The sums thus spent amply demonstrate that Edward was buried in splendour. Besides the sums shown in the elemosina, the hospicium expenses show that £843.4s. was spent during the four days of Edward's funeral, that is, on July 3, 4, 5, and 6. The sum of £566.5s.5d. was spent on the fifth.

It has been previously maintained that most of the account was written by one hand, with the exception of the marginal notations of the exchequer auditors, as well as one or two additions made at the audit. Despite the theory that only one man wrote the account, several discrepancies in the style of writing are evident. These inconsistencies concern the payment of money to several men. The terms most frequently used are cuilibet eorum and utrique; both terms are in the dative case and are in accordance with Classical Latin usage. However, in the two tituli concerning the wages of hunters and falconers, the phrases are suddenly changed. The scribe now uses utroque ad and quolibet. The use of the ablative case is incorrect in accordance with standard Latin grammar and is inconstant with the scribe's previous idiom. Furthermore, on the last page of the Falconers' Wages and Falcons' Food Allowance (Fol. 65), the scribe again reverts to his previous phrase cuilibet eorum. This variance in the style of writing would seem to indicate that the scribe merely copied other scribal accounts without attempting to correct the case endings of the words.

In drawing up the wardrobe account, the scribe made use of the daily accounts kept by the household departments. It would appear that the scribe did not record one section of receipts or expenses at a time. Rather, it seems that the scribe divided his book into its various tituli before commencing his work and then recorded the items in the order that they were presented by the daily accounts. This procedure would not only explain the variance of the writing style but would also explain the blank pages which appear in the account.

In the arrangement of the tituli of receipts and expenses, the scribe maintained a consistent style. The title of the tituli is written at the top of the folio. The items in the tituli are joined without any interruption, even though the tituli, at times, covers more than one page. The sum of the separate items is underlined. Whenever the scribe wishes to subdivide a titulus, the sub-heading is written in the left margin and a large bracket is used to indicate the items under that section. If the scribe totals any sub-heading, that sum is written in the right margin where that section ends. The page totals are written and approved at the bottom of the page; this is also the case with each tituli.

Details of the account of Richard of Beverley, recently Keeper of the Wardrobe of King Edward the Third, grandfather of the present king, of receipts, allowances, and expenses allowed in the same wardrobe from the 25th day of November ending the 50th year of the said grandfather, on which day the said office was entrusted orally to the same Richard by the grandfather himself, until the 21st day of June next following, on which day the same grandfather died. In addition, the period from the 21st day of June until the 26th day of July next following was authorized by the treasurer and barons of this exchequer, because it was between sessions of the Holy Trinity Term, by a writ of the privy seal of the present king given on the 30th day of June in the third year. By this writ the king ordered to be allowed to the same Richard, by the same treasurer and barons, what the same Richard, in an account before them in the same exchequer, was about to return because of his office, by the oath and testimony of William Street, then controller of the aforesaid household, for expenses demonstrably made by the same Richard and William both concerning the body and funeral of the said grandfather and of the continuance of the same household for a certain time after the death of the same grandfather, that is, until the aforesaid 26th day of July, the same day reckoned. The account was drawn up both by the sight and the testimony of the aforesaid controller for a period of half a year and 62 days.
